Q: Javascript-based project with C++ (Qt) back-end I am developing a web-based standalone desktop application using QML and JavaScript (I am a JS newbie and I am using the latest version 0.2.13 of the Qt toolkit). In that application there is a block of code in the javascript file that makes a series of API calls to my C++ (Qt) server, and the result of those calls are displayed back in the application (and for testing purposes I am simply using an alert to show a message). My problem is that while I do get valid responses from my API calls and my C++ code is fine, the response from the Javascript code is not. I have checked my network connection and here is what I get: So I cannot tell if the Javascript is simply hanging on that line, or if it is doing something else (i.e. the response it does get is not valid). Here is the relevant code snippet, as it currently stands:

function execute() { // Dialog box to tell the user about their location //
And get location back using the
"GeoLocation" API location = docum
```

ent.getElementById("picker").value;
if( location ) { var client = new XMLHttpRequest();
client.open("GET", "", true); client.se tRequestHeader("Content-Type", "application/json", true);
client.onreadystatechange =
function() { if (this.readyState == 4)
{ if(this.status == 200) { alert("request OK"); xmlDoc =
this.responseXML; if(xmlDoc!= null)

kinase C and cathepsin B in HCT116 colon carcinoma cells. To investigate the effects of 12-O-tetradecanoyl phorbol 13-acetate (TPA) on the protein kinase C (PKC) signal transduction pathway and cathepsin B (CB) in HCT116 cells, human colon carcinoma cells. The PKC activity and its expression of isoforms were studied. The activity of calpactin I kinase (CK-II) was determined by radioisotope technique using synthetic peptide substrate. The expression of PKC alpha and beta II, PKC epsilon, PKC beta I, PKC delta and phosphorylated PKC activity were studied by immunocytochemistry and Western blotting. The amount of total and phosphorylated cathepsin B protein was determined by Western blotting. The expression and phosphorylation of PKC alpha and PKC epsilon were unchanged in response to TPA. In contrast, a transient 50% inhibition was observed in PKC beta I, PKC delta, and phosphorylated PKC activity. PKC beta II activity was decreased in response to 12-O-tetradecanoylphorbol 13-acetate

(TPA) 10 nM but was increased by 1 microM TPA. However, the TPA effect on PKC delta was not observed. There was a decrease in the total activity and expression of CB in HCT116 cells. In spite of the changes in protein expression of CB, the extent of inhibition of CB activity did not vary. These data demonstrate that inhibition of PKC isoforms by 1 microM TPA did not correlate with CB expression or activity. Taken together, our data suggest that PKC isoform does not regulate the activity of CB in HCT116 cells. Menu Great
