HyperMotion Technology is built into three key areas of gameplay. First, it's directly built into passing, shooting, and dribbling. Second, it powers movement on the pitch - agile touches, pivots, and off-ball runs all use the same data used to animate players' real-life movement. And third, it powers the overall balance of play, such as passing in tight spaces and team-mate interception. "When I saw FIFA 19, my first thought was, 'Hey, this is awesome.' My second thought was, 'I hope it doesn't affect FIFA Ultimate Team,'" said Bruce Granieri, Executive Producer, FIFA 22. "HyperMotion Technology is based on thousands of hours of detailed data collected from hundreds of player movements as they compete in real-world matches from across the globe. From the seams of a shin guard to the tips of player's boots, our teams have taken extraordinary measures to ensure that this data is as accurate as possible." FIFA22 developer Edge of Reality uses a multi-stage approach to combine this data with the movements of millions of players and millions of sportsmen who have sampled their data over the years. This article is available in three languages. "Fans and players want to know how their actions translate into the game, so we've turned the challenge into an opportunity," said Ben Daghish, Xbox Game Studio Head of FIFA. "FIFA 22 will feature dynamic multi-tiered animation where animations vary based on the type of actions being performed. For example, passing with the same animation as shooting will better convey your skill and accuracy." As a result, FIFA 22 includes real-life player animations combined with animation data from players themselves, while the team utilises a multi-stage approach to combine the data with the movements of millions of players and millions of sportsmen who have sampled their data over the years. Exploration Similar to last year's FIFA 21, FIFA 22 also builds a lot of its new features around an improved Exploration layer. This layer sees players explore the pitch on their own, or challenge other players to matches. These two features are available in a new World Operations Hub. New this year, FUT players can use EITHER Touch ID OR a passcode to log into
